

Crate Training

Training your dog to love hanging out in her crate is an excellent way to manage lots of nuisance behaviors like house-soiling or chewing inappropriate objects. It is also very useful when needed for travel or in an emergency.

Choosing Your Crate

A crate should be large enough for your dog to stand up, turn around and stretch out / lie down comfortably but not so large that she can eliminate on one end and sleep on the other. Potty accidents inside the crate can generally be blamed on the crate being too large. Furnish the crate with comfy bedding and chew toys. Wire or plastic crates are better than soft sided crates during the training phase.

First Steps

Do not shut your dog in her crate right away. At first just leave the door open and randomly drop treats in the back throughout the day for her to discover. You may also choose to feed your dog her regular meals inside the crate, while leaving the door open. Once your dog is readily going in and out, let her sniff a tasty treat and let her see you toss it in the back. Do not close the door, but as long as she stays in the crate give her a treat flow of one treat per second (use small treats). Just toss the treats on the floor of the crate for her to sniff around and find. Allow her to exit at will, but if she does just stop the treat flow. Think of this game like turning on the faucet. When your dog is in the crate, the 'treat faucet' is on and when they step out of the crate, the faucet turns off.

Intermediate Steps

Gesture toward the crate and then toss a treat in. When your dog goes in the crate, close the door halfway, then feed her a treat and open the door again. Always allow her to exit. Repeat this step at least 10 times. If your dog begins to hesitate to enter or rush out of the crate, try touching the door instead of attempting to move the door closed. Some dogs need a little more time in this phase before being comfortable seeing the door move. Once your dog remains in the crate, with a calm posture while you touch or move the crate door, then move on to the next step.

You might have noticed your dog beginning to enter the crate before you've treat is tossed. This is great, since part of our next steps are putting entering the crate on a cue. Now you are ready to gesture to the crate and pause for a moment, gesture once and hold your cue out. If after a couple of seconds your dog hasn't entered the crate, use a treat toss, to encourage them to go into the crate.

Once the dog enters, close the door completely, feed a treat through the crate and immediately open the door again. Repeat 10 times. Then begin waiting 2-10 seconds before giving the treat while the door is closed. Vary the timing but always open the door after feeding the treat.

Getting Solid

Signal your dog to her crate and once she's inside give her a Kong stuffed with food (or peanut butter) or a very special chewy your dog doesn't usually get like a bully stick. Close the door and hang out near the crate reading or watching TV. Drop in an extra treat about every 30 seconds. Open the door after 10 minutes.

Repeat the previous step but occasionally leave the room for a few seconds. Then repeat this process on another day and open the door after 30 minutes.

Now you may begin varying your absences from 5 seconds to 5 minutes and give extra treats about every 5-10 minutes. Open the crate after one hour.

Finally, build up the amount of time your dog is in the crate slowly to 3 hours. Vary your absences and the time spent in the crate.

Keeping the Crate Faith

It's important to help your dog keep a healthy relationship with the crate by maintaining their trust that they are in a safe space and that they're going to get out fairly soon. Here are a few more tips to help with this:

- Try to make sure that your dog is getting new and interesting items in their crate. You'll want to be sure they have access to one or more appropriate chewing or licking items to help encourage them to relax. If they are not interested in the toy options, try slathering them with something tasty, like canned food, dog-safe peanut butter, cream cheese or baby food. Once they begin to lick the item they'll likely move on to chewing, which is a soothing activity for dogs.
- Do your best to let your dog out before they begin to show signs of anxiety. If you notice they're beginning to squirm or appear restless, it's best to let them out then, rather than wait until they display bigger signs of stress, like barking or pacing.
- Some dogs prefer to rest in quiet spaces in the home, others in spaces where they can see the action. Audition what might be best for your dog.

- Keep crate time variable. If the schedule is extremely consistent, your dog may stress more on a day when things aren't exact. There's nothing wrong with a little inconsistency, as long as you're staying within the range that your dog is comfortable.
- Using a camera, laptop or cell phone to check in on your dog might be helpful during the beginning stages of crate training while you're learning how long their comfort range is.
